

Fusion Bottle

The fusion bottle is the first foray into cold fusion for the Sahaadi people. While 'hot' fusion is widely understood, 'cold' fusion had only been a dream until experiments had proven it possible. Utilizing three simple elements they were able to produce power one of which was simple sea water. As such further research into the field has produced the fusion bottle. Refinements had been made by introducing small amounts of Veyrinite into the electrodes resulted in boosted output and efficiency. So much so it was enough to warrant usage on vehicles, ships and even to power electronic systems as a secondary power source as some small charge was required to fuel the reaction even if more power had been produced then put in. However they can also be used to help re-fuel mainline reactors by providing some of the deuterium fuel the bottles capture resulting in shorter re-fueling times.
