Flashback:A young boy, not even ten-years-old yet, watched his father embark on the ship, he couldn't place the name at the moment.

"Take care of the house for me, i'll be back, i promise." His father called from the ramp.

"I will dad, I will, be back soon!" He called back, the over-burdened clouds already starting to rain.

Cold rain patted the top of his head, matting it in places. His mother was still at the house-she had to take care of everything else. He felt he should hug his father, show him one last sign of affection before he left to do the dirty job of war, but at the same time, it didn't feel right to hug his father, he was too old for it, although the urge was still there.

Two months later

“Mother, why are you crying?” he asked, the small apartment was cold, his mother obviously hadn't been cooking for dinner, he made a mental note to fix something easy and quick up. His mother however, did not answer his question, just thrust a piece of paper into his hands. He read over the paper, it seemed a report from his father that they had recieved for the last couple of months but then- We regret to inform you that your husband, Malius Fenrir, has died in the line of duty. His ship has skirmished with a pirate ship, ending in its destruction. All escape pods were lost before we could rescue them, and he is known to have died. We grieve with you on your loss.
