Firing Mechanism

Vector-Delayed Blowback, Closed-Bolt

Vector-Delayed Blowback utilizes an articulated mechanism which allows the block and bolt to recoil off-axis into a recess behind the weapon's magazine well. The recoil is redirected down and away from the shoulder unlike most firearms which tend to recoil into it. This produces less muzzle climb and recoil forces typically attributed to standard firearms.

Frame

The frame is made of light-weight ceramics to cut down on overall carry weight but maintain a degree of durability. The fore grip only swings down halfway as there is only an inch of clearance between magazine and grip.

Barrel

The barrel is typical of most Submachine Guns but can also be threaded for the addition of a silencer.
