History

Lars Ando purchased their espresso equipment which he had been maintaining for them, and acquired the lease on their property. Lars Ando recognized that he had no business management experience, so he founded the Ypperlig Café Worker Cooperative to make the business decisions, of which he and all employees are members.

The café was visited by Tatsugami Kozakura and Sonoda Takashi in YE 43 not long after it opened.

Description

Ypperlig Café and Izakaya has an unremarkable storefront with no external indications of being a café other than a sign that is placed outside during business hours.

There is a small piece of paper taped to the inside of the window by the door that reads “営業時間はいつでもです”[Business Hours: From whenever we open to whenever we close.]

Immediately upon entering, a visitor will see a circular wooden bar where baristas perform somehow synchronized chaos to pull espresso shots, perform pour-overs, and so on to fill orders. The circular design of the bar makes it practically impossible to form lines, so patrons walk right up to the bar and wave money for service.

The sitting area is huge but has been filled with a maze of semi-private booths. This labyrinthine design is entirely on purpose, and even though the bar area can be crowded and cacophonous during peak hours, the twists and turns of the booths absorb most of the noise allowing patrons to have quiet conversations while they drink their tasty beverages.
